1.0 Background

The relationship between Public Procurement and what is often termed “Good” Governance is gaining increasing attention. Effective procurement practices provide governments with a means of bringing about social, environmental and economic reform. Conversely, malpractice within public procurement is a government’s major source of corruption and financial loss. Internationally, public procurement is steadily moving towards a policy role, enabling an alignment of procurement policy with government policy. Good governance is epitomized by predictable, open and enlightened policy-making, a bureaucracy imbued with professional ethos acting in furtherance of the public good, the rule of law, transparent processes, and a strong civil society participating in public affairs. Key issues appear repeatedly in the definition of Good Governance, namely: transparency, participation, accountability, efficiency, effectiveness, ethics, equity and responsiveness. This suggests that, across the majority of nations, governance models have moved in similar directions. Yet, implementing these keywords into practice is often problematic as the quest for good governance is thwarted by embedded ways of working and people entrenched in former practices.
